

ELECTIONS IN THE U.S., 1956

This is a scene at the national headquarters of one of the two major political parties in the United States on election night. The partisans are tense and excited as they watch the election returns on the board in the background. What they see is the culmination of long and arduous months of campaigning and related political activity. In November, when Americans vote for President and Vice-President, for many members of Congress, and for thousands of state, county and local officials, similar crowds with similar emotions will jam the national and local headquarters of the political party of their choice and wait for the outcome of the biggest political event of the nation, the quadrennial election of a President of the United States of America. La actual tensión felicitosa en Oriente Medio y familia, y que afecta considerablemente al estado de ánimo del pueblo americano, no impidió que millones de ellos acudieran en su interés y en su interés a los centros oficiales de los partidos que iban dando a conocer la medida de los resultados electorales en todo y cada uno de los 48 estados norteamericanos.
