

ELECTIONS IN THE U.S., 1956

Newspapers in the United States, large and small, keep their millions of subscribers throughout the nation informed of election developments. These papers will be particularly busy from now until next November, when Americans will vote for President and Vice-President, for part of the U.S. Congress, and for thousands of state, county and municipal officials. The press shown here is that of a small town newspaper. Its headlines carry the latest news on local elections. (Photo No. 56-217)
