

U. S. GOVERNMENT RECOGNIZES IMPORTANCE OF FULLY INFORMED PRESS

Presidential press conferences are at the pinnacle of an elaborate apparatus by which all branches of the United States Government keep the American people fully informed of what their government is doing.

Reporters appear in force when visiting dignitaries call on the President, and often interview the visitors when they leave the White House. Here they take notes as President Kennedy, left, bids farewell to Panamanian President Roberto F. Chiari after a visit in the summer of 1962.
